8 Tips for Handling a Job Search While Working Full-Time

1. Avoid advertising a search. A job search is not necessarily a secret, but be aware that word can get around. When a company knows of a search, they may become more protective of their employees. It is often best to keep a search quiet, but in some cases it may be necessary to inform employees. It may be helpful to implement a strict confidentiality policy that limits the number of people who are aware of the search.

2. Keep a log of all job search activities. This will help you track your progress and keep your job search organized. It is also important to keep a record of all communication with potential employers, including telephone calls, emails, and letters.

3. Dress for the job you have, not the one you want. This means dressing in a manner that is appropriate for the position you are currently holding. This will help you maintain a professional image and show that you are serious about your job search.

4. Do not list a current coworker, boss or anyone else associated with that employer in your resume or application. This is a violation of confidentiality and can result in serious consequences.

5. Ask for discretion. This means asking for help from your current employer and others who are aware of your search to keep your search confidential.

6. Maintain employment while looking for a new employer. This means that you should continue to work and show a professional attitude at work.

7. Keep at it. This means that you should continue to search for new opportunities and not give up too soon.

8. Identify outside traditional work hours. This means that you should avoid conducting a search during work hours as much as possible.

Radio Frequency Identification (RFID) systems typically consist of a reader and a tag. The tag can provide identification information and/or information about the environment, such as temperature and humidity. Chipless RFID is a subset of RFID technology where the information is “stored” in the tag’s structure, rather than encoded on a chip. This allows for less expensive tag manufacturing and measurement, as no electronics are required.

In this way identification or sensing can be performed. The wireless passive nature of this technology results in less expensive tag measurement. Changing the structure of the tag or the environment that the tag is in produces changes in this binary code, and in this way identification or sensing can be performed.
